

Author: Keleilait Anain (pahtri, ???, ???)

Context:

Written by pahtri living on Rossevette (in current voitri areas, but somewhat close to Luna-Kimmaret) before voitri concepts became so prevalent.

A somewhat ancient text combining poetry, magick and faith writing, being more of expression of belief of magician than explanatory text. It gradients between Lai-Kine and The Joyous, but is primarily the former, meaning it doesn't strike much of controversy for voitri. Is, however, of enough importance for pahtris to copy it to this day.

There exists a baedoorian version with a preface explaining cultural context, printed by University of Religions in [somewhere, Sargin? dunno].

Style:

Lai-Kine interprets metaphor as direct existence, so tri are not "metaphorically" stars, they are stars. It kinda works on reversed erdic consciousness: the world is not an illusion, the real is everywhere and everything. Myths exist, can be grasped from the past and work upon current.

Symbols:

Dance, singing, songs - are an euphoria, a hedonistic aspect of Lai-Kine and The Joyous
Night sky, restless moon - symbols of Laitalu, a central god of Lai-Kine

Stars - symbol of tri, "children of Laitalu"

Night, light - wisdom in its two sides, an occult and an exposed, truth given by gods

Void, stillness - death, forgetness, apathy is often correlated

[Pahtri Religious Text]

I'm all, but a dancer of worlds is my name. A thread of fate follows children of the night sky, guiding us through eternal night with the distant light - a loving stardance, a warmth of kindred spirits around the fire, and a knowledge of contrasts.

For all that is, my eyes reflect the world around me, all the cracks and rifts carved in rocks, trees and alive beings. The skinny flesh of my being reverberates the distant echo of night, the love of restless moon that gave birth to us all. The desert of the world is vast, and vibrant, beneath its surface there lies lushness of sounds and emotions, open to those who dig with their nails into the soil.

So rage, my child, since just as me, your starlight dances on the eternal dark. Your fury will bring lights closer to each other, and as you tremble into the void, the stillness will bury your spirit in the cold essence. Death is a will, and you will not greet it without your arms stretched towards. Let your palms touch the sky and sing the song of your kindred spirits, as from all joys you can escape.

Baedoorian preface:

A well known piece of poetry in Rossevette, by pahtric magician Keleilait Anain, living in the late Pre Era in the environs of Sagari.

The text blends teachings of Lai-Kine and The Joyous, portraying shared search for depth and knowledge between the two with a more ecstatic lens of pahtric faith. As the voitric uprising put restrictions on Joyous texts, Keleilait's poem remained mainly non-controversial due to its poetic language.