

Origins of Eastern Tri

Written by a baedoorian scholar, Lauren Faennan, in 404NE, for Sargin University. She collected knowledge from multiple other sources (primarily baedoorian and voitric) into a reflective summary of the topic.

The Ancient Past

The origins of tri, whether western or eastern, cannot be split apart. They all originate from the god of the restless moon, Laitalu. Once upon a time, the spirits of Monarei asked them to have someone to play with.

Laitalu poured their reflected light, and the essence of night sky darkness, and made respectively tris and zhis.

When Laitalu made them, they remembered there are still stars in the night sky, and so made eastern tris, ensitri, out of their glimmer - reflecting on them to be joyous, as their existence came as a result of his forgetting, and told them to never forget the things they have.

That's why eastern tris are hedonistic, while western ones - strict and knowledge-centered (tri) as well as occult-inspired (zhis). But as stars also emit light, hence eastern tri are also bound to wisdom and truth-seeking - which is how nikaraites came to be.

Comment:

The symbol of light being wisdom is kept, however the darkness is seen as another form of light; it follows very much the idea of void being a force).

Note:

Plural tri and tris are both valid (tri is translated to "tribe" and encapsulates both singularity and plurality).

The Joyous, Nikaraites and Voitri

As ensitri (shimmering tri) started settling on Veimos and nearby islands, they followed the teachings of Laitalu. Believers of this faith were called The Joyous, and they believed their faith to be represented by dance, tranceish music, sex and feasts. It was common for The Joyous to also make grand festivals, inviting nearby villages and even other races. This built strong relationships between ensitri and goblins, both sharing the values of festiveness. A bit less so with latoka, however latokas treated this leniently and many of them were coming to play and eat together.

As much as hedonistic ensitri were, they also established rules – seen more as a manner than true rule, but breaking one repeatedly could lead to ostracisation – to not [.....]

The rules however didn't prohibit things like interracial mating, leading to ensitri changing over time, most specifically becoming lesser in height.

This also gave rise to nikaraitis and voitri. While entirely different movements, they both saw interraciality as a negative trait, and the changing of their kin as a practice shameful to tri kind.

Voitri – or black tri, faithful tri – were tris of Rossevette island, who opposed the Joyous from the perspective of their own faith. Voitri were faithful to Laitalu, in fact they considered themselves the only faithful ones, as opposed to The Joyous who reinterpreted his teaching to empty, hedonistic self-joy.

The voitri movement becoming quite strong on the island made the tensions between The Joyous and Voitri an unique battlefield – where the proportions were fairly equal, yet Voitri held more power, usually being in positions that let them do more state-wise. This slowly brought the equality into inequality, where voitris started to enforce their doctrinal laws, pushing The Joyous to the margins, and finally starting to punish them.

At this point, the non-voitris needed to decide. Many Joyous subdued their faith and started serving Voitris, which affected particularly the ones from heartlands who couldn't migrate nor hide as easily.

Some Joyous and nikaraites (who migrated here earlier) hid in latoka lands, with Luna-Kimmaret being the most striking example of these groups living together in fairly peaceful relations.

Others migrated south - to the lands of Arennan. This particularly was a choice of tris living on western-south side of the island, being part of what will later become an Order of the Fifth Hand.

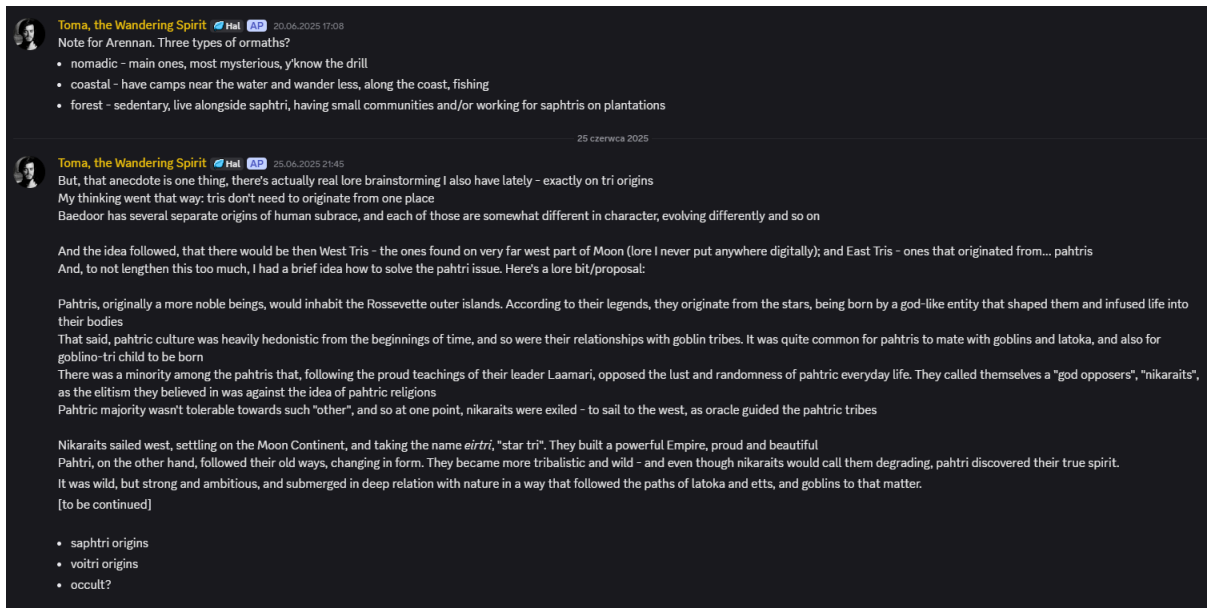

The Joyous and particularly nikaraites who kept their faith, but also remained on lands that were later ruled by orders or Magistrate, became an object of ostracisation or even persecutions (the most violent acts however were primarily towards nikaraites, as hedonistic Joyous were seen a bit more as misguided and open to conversion).

Nikaraits – the god opposers – was a movement arising on outer Rossevette islands. They were seeing The Joyous as followers of Laitalu teaching, and so they positioned themselves as opposers of the laws of their creator. They explicitly argued and revolted against The Joyous, but being a minority, they fell quickly into ostracisation.

While the tension between Joyous and Nikarait wasn't too violent, the decision by Joyous priests were made that the opposers need to be exiled, as the two groups can't coexist and this would serve as an example to the opposers to either subserve to the Joyous faith, or to see themselves leaving.

This gave rise to Nikarait migrations – most sailed east, to the Moon Continent, becoming what is later known as western ensitri, just ensitri, or nikaraitians. A small group of Nikarait sailed to main Rossevette, knowing The Joyous there is less strong, albeit this group suffered from particularly vile treatment by later voitri orders (unless they escaped together with The Joyous to Arennan).

Some lore that would be good to transfer ^ (incl. ormaths)

Generally this thread is super important:

And also I think the good, interesting take would be that:

- western eirtri (Moon ones) were god opposers (nikaraits), and shaped their identity through revolt against their creator
- voitri reinterpreted Laitalu instead, considering their reading as "true" and thus kept the "faithfulness" part (= nikaraits wouldn't be voitri) and established strict religious orders to keep rules under control (non-mating with latoka as example)
- saphtri are exiled Joyous from main Rossevette, but there are also Joyous that escaped to latoka (Luna-Kimmaret) who are not saphtri
- saphtri/voitri/pahtri/w. eirtri are race differences alongside cultural, because their bodies changed (saphtri = adapted to desert, voitri = adapted to occult practices, pahtri = adapted to mating, w. eirtri = whitened/silvered as a symbol of revolt)
