This document is put here, so all big and clumsy issues can be brainstormed and resolved.

Issues Remaining

Why didn't baedoorians sail west, to the Moon, before the Exodus? Why did they pick that direction there during Exodus?
The best idea for the caution would be danger caused by civilisations living around Agoi, in waters. This gives a neat opportunity to make underwater cities, but also... needs reasons why during Exodus they were all somehow peaceful? It is quite handy that they only started doing journeys there at that time as the necessity appeared.
(somewhat related to issue B.)

How did ghlodds appear on Ansur in counts enough to get a temple? Travelling across such distance to bury the dead is insane, and so is the appearance of a bigger (somehow) minority on Ansur?

Even if we know why tris were made so far apart, why did they appear exactly in particular spots, and not elsewhere? Why do Laitalu care about Rossevette and West Moon in particular? Did Laitalu made these lands?
Loose idea: the "second" moon only circles around the half of the continent? basically making Laitalu kingdom between Moon and Baedoor Island, and he might have made more creatures than just tri...

Issues Solved

A. Why the heck Jitado decided to go so far away to reach Baedoor? Wouldn't they reach the northern islands first?
Solution: Moved Jitado up, therefore making jitadians travellers go around Mes Inpea - they decided that way, so they can resupply in mesinpean ports. This also solves why 1) ~~WesternWald could be named as west~~, 2) they eventually landed on Rakonnd Coast

B. Why the heck Baedoor didn't invade the Moon earlier?

Solution: Aside from Agoi, there are water civilisations living in between. They are quite powerful, and they would defend themselves. Additionally, there wasn't really civilised place to go there if they wanted to trade (either nordwinians being pretty wild, suspicious Agoi/water empires, and dangerous tertens)

C. Why the heck West Baedoor now doesn't attack lands around?

Solution: Northern civilisations teamed up and also joined Agoi, forging a powerful coalition against Baedoor, if they were ever to attack. This basically makes it impossible for West Baedoor to attack and not get wiped out in the process. Them not being multicontinental empire anymore also doesn't help

D. Why has no one encountered "Other Lands" territories?

Solution: Reversing narracy - actually people did. They are just so far away that not many do know much about them, as they are even further than islanders

E. Where are countless small countries you added alongside big ones (Jitado, Mes Inpea, Seiteh, Baedoor)?

Solution: Basically the archipelago south from Jitado/Seiteh is where they are. Archipelagos are fun

F. Baedoor is bland and boring

Solution: Adds fuckload of various races in outskirts, such as water Empire, ormath indian-like Empire, psijic Empire and islanders

G. Why didn't Tri/Ghlodds fight?

Solution: Not only they did (Septei, border of it), but on west/east there was Aev race making war traversing impossible - hence biggest fights between Tri and Ghlodds were made on Septei and were mostly naval ones

H. Why didn't Baedoor/Mes Inpea meet people from the Moon Continent easily?

Solution: Moon-shaped Permafrost made them unable to get across - they could only take long way via boats, but it is quite damn far to go across whole universe
But they met them from time to time - they treated their lands similarly to how Europeans treat orient, as an exclusive journey taken only by the richest or year-long trading route.
Mind you that there are several sources over Baedoor-Moon relations, including Tom Varteford earning high rank in West Moon or writers talking about Moon flora (Dant de Steye) or geography/society (Frederico Alexander).

I assume they would travel to Moon via the northern route (Rakonnd-northern shore of East Moon, above Agoi-northern shore of Centre Moon~West Moon). This would explain why most current sources talk about countries that are northern (no talk about anything south, including islands) and West Moon, as they are directly reachable from that path. It'd also make the quickest way to Oe'os and Seiteh, including possible branching into Jitado/Mes Inpea/Eimr if needed.
Going to the southern shore makes little sense because of dangers (underwater empire, tertens) ~~and lack of civilised life there~~.

I. Why are Tri on two opposite sides of the universe? What are the origins of pahtris, saphtris, voitris, lunatris, how are those origins interacting (or not) with each other? What explains the differences and similarities between them?

As explained in Origins of Eastern Tri, tri - in general - appeared as a result of Laitalu god creating them out of nightsky. They created them in two origin places - Moon's western island (lunatri and zhi) and Rossevette (eirtri).

Eirtri, unlike their western counterparts, have picked joy and lustfulness as a vehicle for praising Laitalu. This led to other culture-races to appear, all due to biggest religious schisms eirtri introduced.

Pahtri are the original inhabitants and original eirtri - living closest to nature, and celebrating Laitalu faith as The Joyous, in purest form.

They took this name as a pejorative put on them by voitri, but reintroduced as a joyful nudge towards their faith values - as enjoying the little, and as stars being little parts of the whole.

Pahtri primarily remained on the outer Rossevette islands.

Western Eirtri, or just eirtri in baedoorian books, are the civilisation of outer eirtri who were banished for not following The Joyous path, instead valuing purity. Western eirtri lightened their skin, so they appear almost pale white/gray.

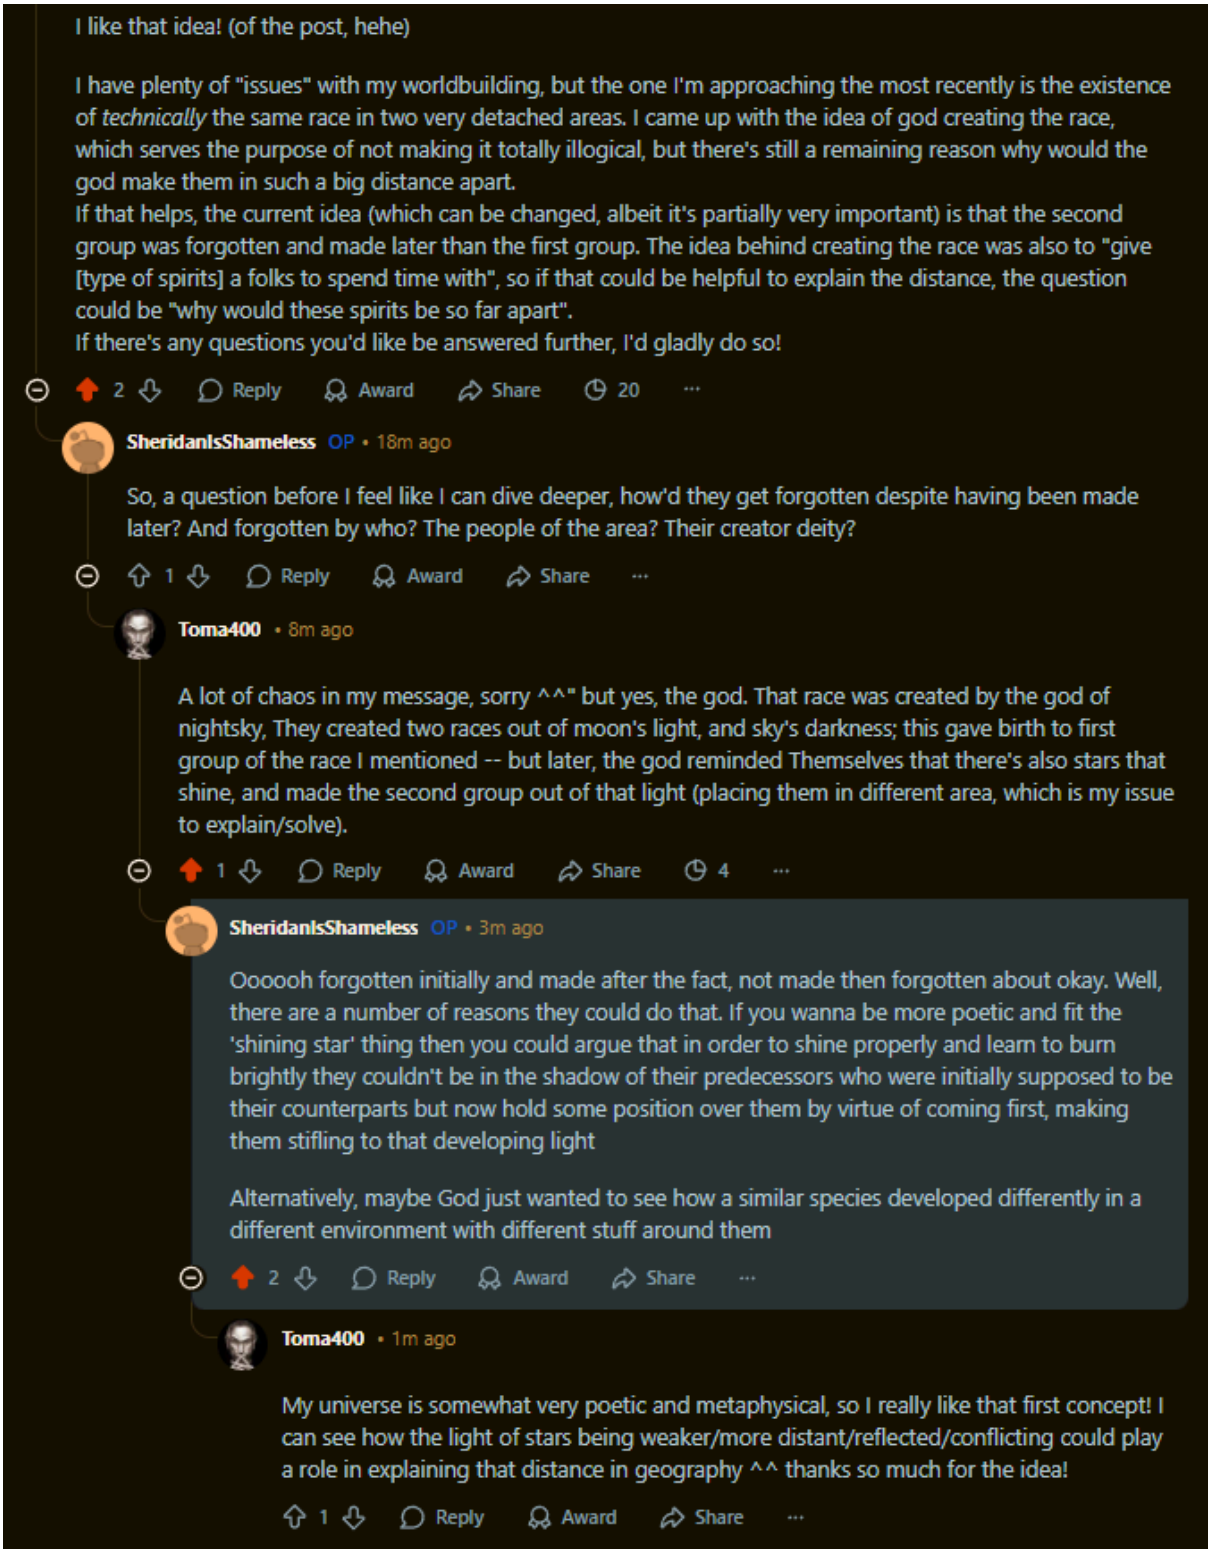

Voitri are the eirtri who inhabited main Rossevette island, and unlike outer eirtris, the path of purity won over the one of The Joyous. They express xenophobic approach as a result, but also express love for higher art, as the split into two types of creations appeared as a result of their philosophy.

Voitris also darken their skin as a way to amplify the meaning of "voi", "the faithful".

Although voitri dominated over latoka before baedoorians conquered Rossevette, they valued their neighbours for representing what they saw as "higher culture". In case of outer Rossevette pahtris, voitris haven't tried to forcefully convert them, as they would see this as a sacrilege against their own folk - both tris fairly respected their own drawn boundaries because of that. Saphtri are the followers of The Joyful who left main Rossevette island in similar exile as western eirtris experienced. They sailed south to the Arennan lands, and built their homes there right before the land started changing to desert. Over time, they have gotten yellowish skin due to sun and their traditions mixed with the ones of ormaths and luuika, a small race inhabiting Arennan's coasts that has origins in Ixathei continent. Current saphtris are in fact a mix of eirtri and luuika traditions and genealogy - thus it's common for saphtris to look at both Rossevette and Ixathei as their homes.

Also pretty great response from one r/worldbuilding thread I asked my question on:

My internal response further contextualising:

Brought my issue with eastern/western tri divide to one cool r/worldbuilding post "let's help each other" and OP came with quite cool concept! Considering how much of symbolism was in tri already, I can see this being a viable explanation. It's more like an idea pitch anyway, so will polish this concept to make it congruent with spiritual/magic part of the universe (so that symbolism has some connection to reality).