

Dyalnesi Deities

A short brainstorming/guide on Dyalnesi gods, being the main source of jitadish and baedoorian pantheon.

Tahaketi

The blind god of paths, wanderers and sailors, also ones lost in life and seeking guidance. Represents the general struggles, but also the overcoming of it through internal and external matters, it's a chaos that constantly seeks. Patron of artists and shadow leaders.

Depicted in many ways, most common being a blind wanderer with a band over the head covering eyes. Less common imagery depicts him as amalgamation of malfunctioned bodies, with each one having either cut off legs, hands, eyes, or mouth.

Often seen as the origin of jitadean "Jesus" and influence of many similar gods in neighbouring areas.

Inspiration: "El Topo", first master's servant

Namatun

The deity of cows, plagues and diseases. While at first seen as deity of agriculture, with great plague brought by cows it got connected to Namatun and seen as a wrath of gods that fought the battle and turned their back against humans*. Only worshipped on Vari, after the wrath it was replaced by Monokaete.

* this is also when the idea of destroyer gods was shaped

Monokaete

Later known as Monokaet, is deity of workers, the builders, miners and all that requires strength and repetition. It is portrayed by the bull and a man wrangling it by the horns – horns are the main symbol representing the deity.

In the jitadean empire and under minotaurian influences, Monokaete merged with Itkehes into a more broad deity of discipline and broader strength.

Itkehes

Also Itanis in jitadean/baedoorian. Originally a god of architects and philosophy, as theoretical thinking that is functional and ordered (as opposed to Tahaketi's chaos).

Later it became known for overall logic, rules, discipline and strength seen as both physical and mental value. It conveys the idea that both physical and intellectual form is important to shape an individual, and that excellence is done by work and repetition. In late Baedoor it is also often used as a figure of workers' and humans' rights.

Modern depiction of the god showcases a muscular philosopher holding circular calendar* and a steel square in one hand (pointed to the ground, as to remind of physical ideals) and a book in the other (pointed up), as a symbol of theory that supplements praxis. It also praises the importance of writing.

* the shape is a reference to Monokaete's horns and the seasonal nature of agriculture

Aetadate

Also Aeladate, goddess of family, big Dyalnesi houses, the patriarchal hierarchy, patron of kings and leaders established by tradition and law*.

* later this combination of family/leadership will influence the family-based administrative system of jitadeans and baedoorians
