

Goblin Megadoc

This document is made with the purpose of collecting all information on goblins, gathered from notebooks and also ideated afterwards.

Table of contents:

- ❖ Origins & Influences
- ❖ Geographical Distribution
- ❖ Cultures
 - Mountainers
 - Character
 - Society
 - History
 - Religion
 - Lowlanders
 - Character
 - Society
 - History
 - Religion
 - Vershaton
 - Character
 - Society
 - History
 - Religion
 - Islanders
 - Character
 - Society
 - History
 - Religion
 - Kaer
 - Character
 - Society
 - History
 - Religion
- ❖ Game implementation

Origins & Influences

Baedoor goblins are heavily influenced by two worldbuildings: The Elder Scrolls and Battle Mages.

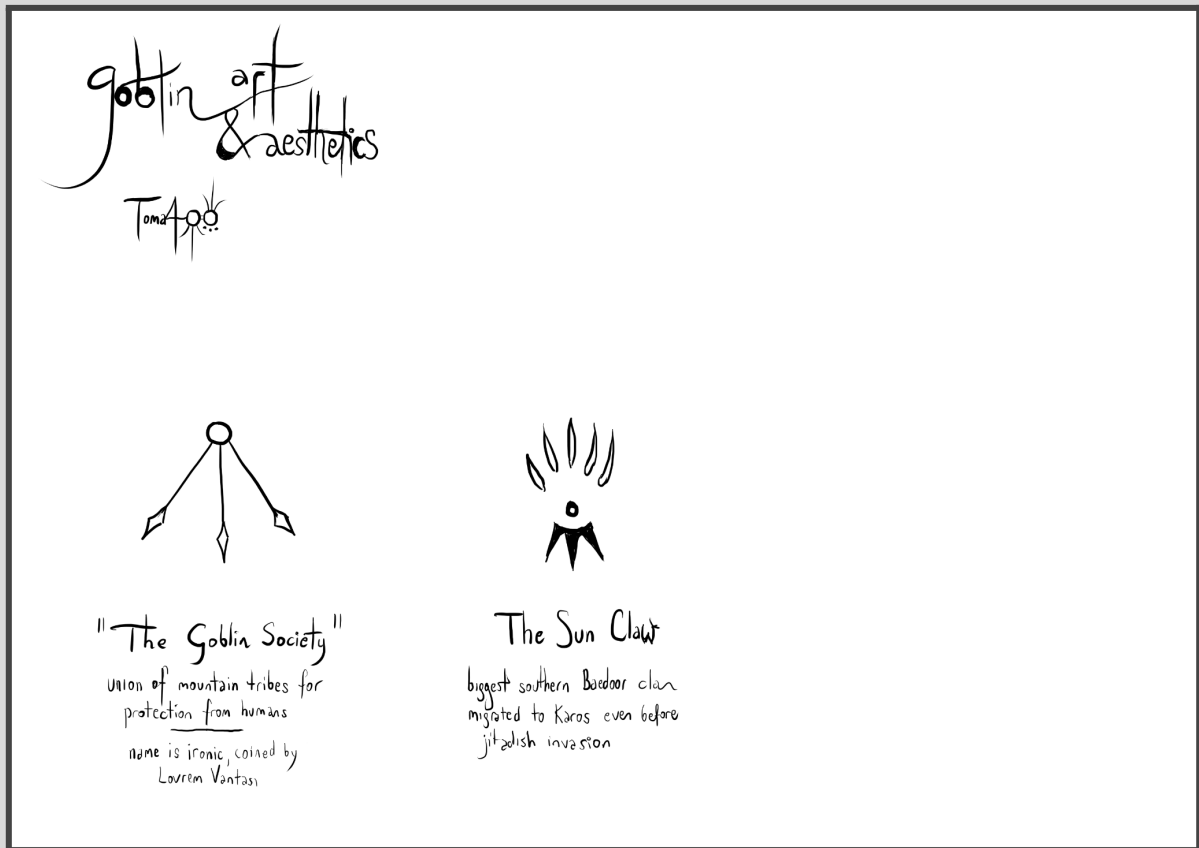

TES brings the idea of wild, yet still pretty organised creatures that built some sort of primitive culture. On the contrary, Battle Mages show goblins as quite intelligent and tech-oriented.

Geographical Distribution

Goblins are native race to all islands in the middle of the continent. They inhabited all areas that are fairly grassy, with exception of Vershaton which they did despite its harsh environment.

Cultures

Architecture pitches

- Rossevette goblins having painted huts' walls/pallisades

Culture pitches

Outcast Tribes

In very rare cases, if a few exiled goblins meet, they can form an outcast tribe - a tribe that is built by those without a tribe. That said, such situations happen extremely rarely, as the sheer fact of ostracisation is rare, and so it's unlikely that in the same time there will be more than two or three lone goblins wandering in a fairly big area. And even with such a situation, knowing about their exile, the bonds between outcasts do not build easily, since departure from the tribe usually means that goblin is not to be trusted.

That said, there exist a few tribes that were built upon exiles, but most of them haven't survived to this day.

Goblin spirituality

Main beliefs

Goblins do not believe in gods. For them, everything alive is a spirit. While they do not claim spirits to be inherently "evil", they are rather sceptical about trusting them (with some exceptions, of course, most striking being Blood Tribes).

This is why the preferred way of dealing with spirits is just existing in a way that does not bother them. If spirits are disinterested in a goblin tribe, this is the best outcome for everyone. That said, sometimes there is no way for this to happen, and so in this case, goblins try to put effort in either to make spirits friendly or make them go away - be it by providing them something they want, or forcing them out, depending on the extent of demands.

Goblins usually do not perform sacrifices of tribes' members, as while this could be seen as a legit form of contributing to the tribe, this is considered as something not justified in most cases and rather wasteful.

Protection from spirits

Goblins use various protections from spirits, trying to keep them away.

One of more popular ones are death fences, being a group of wooden pales with heads mounted on them, located primarily around burial sites. They do not work as a threat that anyone coming into them ends up being dead like the heads impaled, although it's a common misconception. The heads impaled must be of goblin warriors of the tribe, as goblins believe spirit resides in the skull, and so this way warriors protect the site after death.

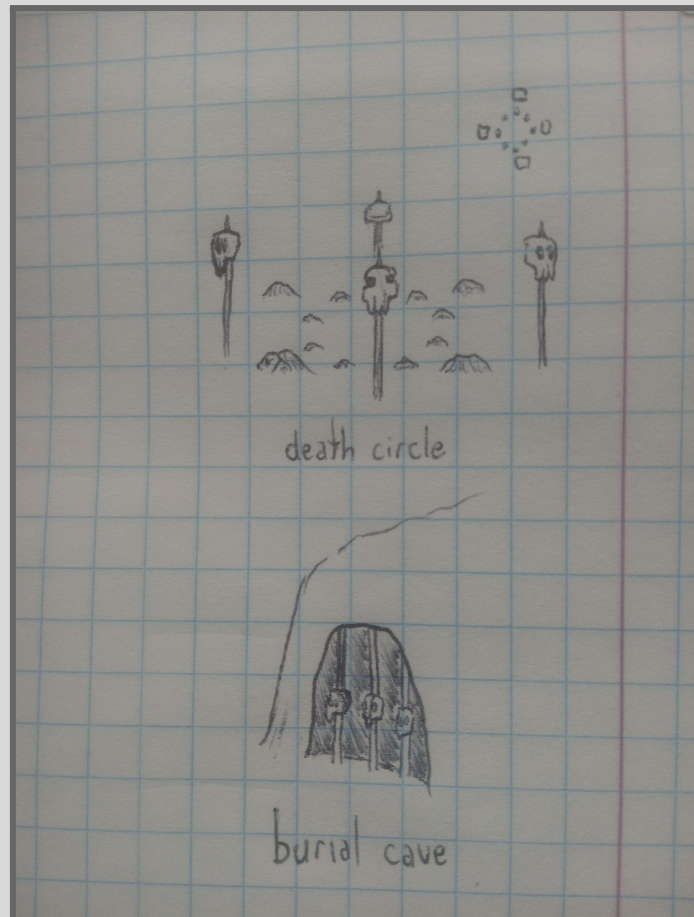

[mirror cages]

Burial pitches

Burials are entirely communal – they exist within the frame of the tribe, and unless tribe moves, it usually is built within the same area. With time, the burial area expands and can grow to be fairly big. Communal character provides safety for all tribe members. This adds one layer of context to goblins that are exiled – it puts their existence both in danger during their life, but also after their death.

Burial areas are sacred for goblins, so even if tribes fight between each other, they do not destroy or trespass each other's burial grounds. If the tribe is annihilated due to the war, goblins winning should bury all their dead in their burial area, providing respective death fence equivalents to protect the-now-extinct tribe.

Burial areas are primarily built in two ways – open death circles (which don't need to be necessarily circles, but usually take this kind of shape) and closed burial caves.

They both serve the same purposes, but whether one or the other is built depends heavily on the environment the tribe resides in. The major feature of both objects is to have the sacred area (cemetery) and the death fences that protects it. If the burial area is in the open, a death fence should be made around the entire area - in the case of a burial cave, it only needs to be protected on the entrance(s). Due to that lesser cost in fences, burial caves are often used by smaller tribes.

Burial sites are often additionally protected by some magical patterns of stones or other equipment with magical properties.

[/problem with outcasts since they don't get buried; this keeps goblins in one place mostly (tho ofc they will move if needed); burials initially need few warriors die beforehand <not that big because well, goblins switch roles>]