

Historical Account of Latoka

The below depicts the detailed history of latoka – depicted through the lens of all its cultures, through their forming and changes.

Early Forming (unknown PE)

At the very beginning, latoka was spread a bit less, residing on the northern parts of Rossevette and only partially on this side of the Dead Mountains.

As first settlements were forming, latoka were building their first communities. Due to material conditions and distances, there were several cultures forming, each having many similarities, but also differences shaping them:

- bigger
 - the north-western bay of farmers became what was later referenced as Likkrot culture
 - between Likkrot and etts, there was also a mountainous farmers culture named Nanat
 - on the northern/north-western coast (Tarsis-Abar) the coastal culture was born. Named Tarsis-Abar after two main settlements of the time, it was heavily reliable on sea; they built the most ships, were first to trade with eirtris and built the first rich mini-kingdom
 - a bit south of Tarsis-Abar coast, the small group of Kuman culture established village of Leveiihat
 - on western coast, there was a small community of shore-hunters that lived out of similar marine life, but being separated from the lush center of the island, they lived a poor, difficult life
 - on mountains separating shore-hunters lived the group of latoka that had somewhat struggled in their early era due to lack of good food sources; etts have been often known to build their own primitive stone fortresses, then raid the latoka and eirtris down the mountain –

just to get back to their dangerous, raviney lands right after; the name of the culture is derived from the biggest fortress, Danat-Ett

- deeper into the center of the island, there was a culture called Nan Ammarat. Living in the very depths of the forests, they were hard to find, but their culture thrived from resources they were gathering. Nan Ammarat was also the culture most involved in interactions with goblins, and thus they became the most syncretic in their beliefs
- similarly deep into the forests, but somewhat more north was a culture of Seyhe. Not differing too dramatically from Nan Ammarat, they lived more in the open and preferred creating denser communes resulting in excavating more of environment for their needs
- On eastern coast there was a culture of latoka named Nan Lakkurut, who built similarly strong fleet as Tarsis-Abar, but benefitted heavily due to trades with southern eirtris, both on land and a sea
- tiny
 - on north-western, there was Likt culture of wandering mountainous latokas, who merged quickly to Nanat since the areas inhabited by Likt culture were not inhabitable enough

With many smaller cultures shaping in between the above ones. Over time, each culture has shaped its borders more rigidly, but they still pursued frequent contacts with each other.

NOTES

I think what could be nice is that initially there were a ton of tiny areas populated by cultures, and each having a very small amount of influence - mostly a town, town with village(s), etc.

After a while shires/realms became a thing, unifying some cultures under administrative lens, and building their identity a bit more into the land. Not long after, two kingdoms appeared, unifying realms more, but coming later with a backstory of rivalry. Voitric efforts brought latoka to the understanding that bigger atomic spread, yet bigger unity was a good point to take – therefore after peace of treaty the system of realms comes back, but now built upon shared diplomacy agreements to protect one another.

Shire Kingdoms (unknown PE - 1400 PE)

It's at that time when the first settlements started to grow, letting some of the cultures dominate over the area.

Tarsis-Abar expanded their ports in Tarsis and Abar, building one of two biggest fleets, dominating the sea trade with western isles. With time, coastal culture of Tarsis-Abar also started with their first missions to settle outside Rossevette proper.

Shore-Hunters haven't developed that much beyond small settlements, and in addition some of them started to live from pirate life to survive – becoming a threat to Karos and both eirtric and Tarsis-Abar shores.

Etts haven't particularly changed their ways of living, but with time there was a direct pushback against their rides. In return, etts fortified their small military settlements, making it difficult for other cultures to traverse the area. They also expanded their influences a bit more south, taking most of the mountains, including the parts that previously were more eirtric (despite lack of their settlement there).

Nan Ammarat expanded slowly, focusing heavily on building their big jewel of the forest, the City of Glass, called Lemanondorat.

Seyhe expanded their influences by building an excessive amount of villages and absorbing some minor cultures spread around. The borders of Seyhe touched the one of Tarsis-Abar on the west, Nan Lakkurut on the east, and touched the northern coast, settling it with some small settlements.

Likkrot-Nanat culture, previously a tiny community settling the hills between Tarsis-Abar, Seyhe and Nan Ammarat, expanded a bit more with their beneficial mining facilities and heavy focus on research. They founded the fortress named Kathar to defend the lowlands from ettic forces, and started building a bigger settlement named Nanat nearby that was a village before.

Nan Lakkurut expanded economically, making the city of Enid-Iliot (made out of two villages, Enid and Iliot) the biggest of latoka civilisation at the time. Lakkurut was also the culture valued the most highly by eirtri, seen as a capital of the northern sea and a place of vehement artistic and economic potential.

Realms – Characteristics

Realms are separate administrative entities that emerged early in latoka culture, were given up to the idea of kingdoms, but currently were restored as an effect of Varteford Treaty.

They keep their independent character, but form a unified state entity as a council – meaning there's two ideas of a state within Northern Rossevette, one local and one national.

Ascaron

- the most baedoorian-friendly, kept their embassy and frequent trade routes

Likkrot-Nanat

- their funerary practices are more outside than usual latoka, tombs are found in wilderness instead near the cities
